Understanding the intricacies of citing this influential textbook is paramount for students and researchers alike in fields such as psychology, education, and human development.

Understanding In-Text Citations

In-text citations, appearing within the body of your work, briefly indicate the source of the information. For Santrock Lifespan Development, the general format is straightforward. For example, if you're referring to a specific concept discussed on page 150, the in-text citation would look like this: (Santrock, 2020, p. 150). Remember to always replace "2020" with the actual publication year of the 13th edition. If paraphrasing a broader idea from Chapter 5, you might write: Santrock (2020) details the crucial role of social interaction in cognitive development (Chapter 5). Note that you do not need a page number when paraphrasing from a larger section.

Multiple authors within the same paragraph should be cited using the same format as in the reference list. For instance, if referencing several studies cited by Santrock on the subject of attachment theory, you might see a similar reference within your text, and then a combined entry in the reference list.

Crafting the Reference List Entry

The reference list appears at the end of your paper and provides complete bibliographic information for each source cited. The entry for Santrock Lifespan Development, 13th edition in APA style follows this format:

Santrock, J. W. (2020). Lifespan development (13th ed.). McGraw-Hill Education.

The edition number (13th ed.) is crucial for distinguishing it from previous editions. Incorrectly citing the edition can lead to confusion and impact the credibility of your work.
